at the open door, and, motioned him to the stairs.

At their head stood a young girl. In that moment he thought her but a child, but her air of quiet dignity, as see held out a little, cold head of welcome, and simply said. "My father you will find very it! I fear." made him glance again into her face, to see if indeed his mother's words were not true, and on three slight young shoulders was not set a gray head. But no, the face was young and exquisitely lovely. The great bine eyes looked up at him piteously, the red lips givered; but about her, spite of this, was an air of intonee calm, as though also had nerved deviself to suppress all signs of agitation, of grigi.
